Postcolonialism Today

Web-Lecture Series from 12- 14 Oct, 2020

Organised by departments of English,

Triveni Devi Bhalotia College

&

Onda Thana Mahavidyalaya

I too write from within this inheritance. Postcolonial scholarship is committed, almost by definition, to engaging the universals—such as the abstract figure of the human or that of Reason—that were forged in eighteenth-century Europe and that underlie the human sciences. (05)

Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe (2008)

Contemporary postcolonial theories and practices have taken a significant turn towards the universal- towards the human. The urge to 'provincializing Europe,' to move away from Eurocentrism towards a 'golabectic' (Thiong'o) humanism is the call of the day. Fanon seems to be more radical: "Let us waste no time in sterile litanies and nauseating mimicry. Leave this Europe where they are never done talking of Man' (09). The primary focus of our web lecture is the recent development in postcolonial thoughts.

Incidentally, postcolonialism (the non-hyphenated one) is a tendency- an attitude to write back to the colonial past and at the same time to 're-member' (Thiong'o) the pre-colonial past that has been brutally dismantled and buried by the colonial administrations. Said's phenomenal work Orientalism (1978) addresses the matter of 'binary social relation' which helped the Europe divide the world into two halves-the Orient and the Occident. In The Empire Writes Back (1989) Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths and Helen Tiffin look into the future of English language in countries with history of colonialism' (McLeod 25). The language question was raised by Thiong'o in Decolonizing the Mind (1986) in which he bade farewell to the English language as the first language for his writings. Bhabha challenged the 'ideological validity of colonialism' with his theory of 'mimicry' and 'hybridity.' Spivak introduced the terms 'Essentialism' and 'Strategic Essentialism' to show how the postcolonial societies operate culturally. Postcolonial feminisms tend to challenge the Western ethics to counter patriarchal exploitation and gendering of women. Theorists, such as Audre Lord and Chandra Talpade Mohanty argue that in the purview of the European feminist thoughts the Third World women are viewed as a unitary, singular construction, thereby failing to address the complex nuances of the woman question.

The web lectures will be delivered by some of the best thinkers and theorists from all over the world, namely, Prof. Bill Ashcroft, Prof. Fiona McCann, Prof. Claire Omhovere, Prof. Bibhas Choudhury, Prof. Sumbul Nasim, Thomas Lynn, and Dr. Kunal Basu. We welcome all to register duly and participate in the web lecture series to held from 12 October to 14 October 2020.
